

This folksy little tale has all the qualities of legend and as the narrator suggests the account that Tom Janacek relates is simply one of the many versions of the legend that are around the county. The narrator who reports the slightly comic mishap that befell Brenner's paint is really not a definite person in the story, but is the collective voice of the community and he tells the tale with a straight face.

This is a tale rather than a short story. (There is a subtle difference between the two, this being chiefly that the s.s. events are dramatized rather than related, as they are in the tale.) Like many tales, this one has a definite folksy and native individual trait to it, and the tone is consistent. I don't know what are its chances for publication are, but a possibility might be the Sunday supplement section of the one of the city's newspapers.

The writing throughout is consistent, and the picture the piece conveys is fresh and vivid.
